Wood Species

maple

Maple is a strong, evenly-textured wood with a natural luster. While it is very uniform, you will notice random mineral streaks, worm tracks, or birds-eye patterns. The grain is primarily straight, but can be wavy at times. Maple is a closed-grain wood that sands to a very smooth finish. As it ages, maple will take on a golden hue. Due to the density and hardness of maple, natural expansion and contraction may be more apparent at joints than with softer hardwoods.

cherry

Cherry's smooth, tight- grain, rich color, and stability have won high favor for use in kitchen cabinetry. Cherry ranges in color from white to deep red-brown. It is exceptionally stable & unsurpassed in its finishing qualities. Cherry's color deepens, mellows, with age due to its unique photosensitivity.

oak

Red oak is strong, warm and open-grained. Because of oak's open grain it has a semi-smooth feel after it has been finished. Oak stains evenly with a pronounced grain. Some color variation from reddish-tan to medium-brown is possible in its natural state. Occasional pin knots and mineral streaks are also characteristic of oak.

hickory

Hickory is a relatively smooth hardwood chosen for its dramatic color and shade variation and its prominent grain. Color can vary from nearly white to medium - brown. Bird pecks, small pin knots, and mineral streaks are common in hickory.

Glazing

artist brush glaze

Improved Consistency. No two doors are alike but this technique allows us to individually work on each component one at a time, developing a distinct accent. These artistic hand painted accents emphasize the details of each profile in its own unique way.

old-world glaze

Truly hand-crafted; a consistently inconsistent application. The genuine art of flood glazing involves a hand wiped technique that in some cases leaves behind an overlay of color, as well as accented tones of glazing in the corners and recesses of the door. No two doors will look alike. This flood glaze process will cover the entire finished exterior of the cabinet, face frames and end panels included.
